

Environmental development projects in the context of Myanmar, as a country, and its state, have resulted in a growing reliance on state-led environmental (state-led) initiatives. The growing foreign aid agencies and NGOs and national community organizing is largely operating in the environmental space. (Friedman and Brown, 2012). The national government has recently increased its support of national institutions and projects. Environmental conservation organizations are increasingly involved in policy development (Friedman and Brown, 2012). The new national approach to policy development is largely state-led, with some of projects not supported independently. The government of Thailand is also actively supporting Myanmar. (Friedman and Brown, 2012). Environmental conservation organizations have been largely involved in policy development. The government of Thailand is also actively supporting Myanmar. (Friedman and Brown, 2012). Environmental conservation organizations have been largely involved in policy development. The government of Thailand is also actively supporting Myanmar. (Friedman and Brown, 2012).

© 2000 Blackwell Science Ltd Journal of Internal Medicine 247: 111–117

