

"Significant research is needed to assess the value of these services to those who use them, and to determine the best way to deliver them," says Dr. Glick. "The Department of Health Policy's Health Care Policy Research Program is well suited and eager to conduct this type of research. Having already completed work on education and child abuse, they are greatly interested in the potential impact of health care on society and public administration generally. We'll be studying the impact of health care on the lives of Americans, and potential new job creation in health care facilities, among other things. We'll be looking at the impact of health care on the economy and on society." Dr. Glick is also interested in the impact of health care on the environment.