The possible causes for the delay in providing police and GPs with necessary information are explored and the consequences discussed. The authors then discuss the role of secondary agencies in assessing, planning and implementing interventions. The authors also provide information on possible policies within the criminal justice system (CJS) which further promote the effectiveness of the police in the aftermath of a disaster, whereas the following strategies appear useful to enhance the police's role in disaster scenarios. Referring to the role of GPs and hospitals, further suggestions are provided in the context of the importance of research in the post-disaster phase of the CJS system. In addition, the authors also discuss the importance of the CJS in disaster recovery and the role of the police in the aftermath of a disaster.
