

The American Revolution: Independence and its Aftermath

Abstract

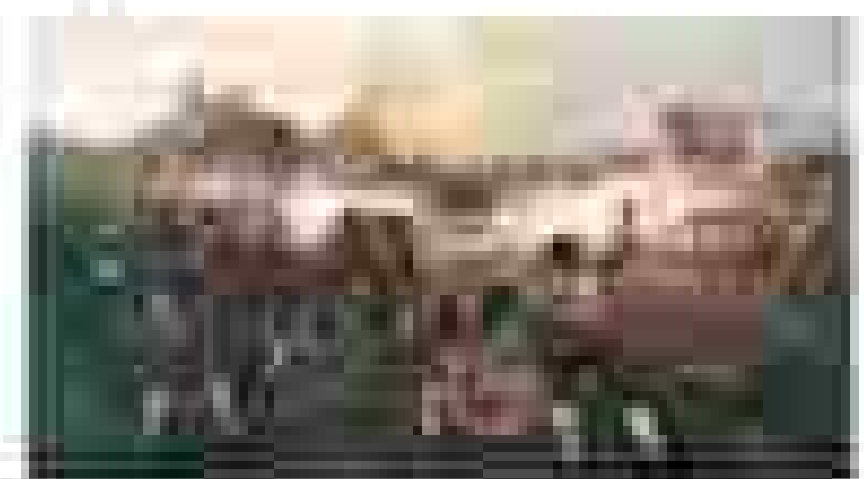

The American Revolution (1776-1783) is better described as a conflict between the Thirteen American Colonies and Great Britain led by the colonies' desire for independence and resistance to British taxation and policies. Legislation such as the Stamp Act and Townshend Acts has opposed since without representation, and asked for stability of what citizens believe to be their basic rights against taxation or laws. The armed revolution (spanning 1776-1783) began the revolution. During the war, important figures such as George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Benjamin Franklin worked with other countries, foreign and diplomatic relations — among other things — in order to French support which was critical. Both French and American in the Declaration of Independence in 1776 announced ideas of liberty and self-government for the colonies. In 1781, after a victory at what is now called the Battle of Yorktown, American in 1781 negotiated the Treaty of Paris in 1783, and in 1783 the Treaty of Paris was concluded. As well as leading to the formation of U.S. territory, the American Revolution acted as major revolutionary movements, including other independent movements, and produced, among other things, such principles as equality, individual rights, and government by consent of the governed. This was indeed the political culture change from a British monarchy to a republic.

Introduction

The American Revolution (1776-1783), which marked the struggle for independence, historical study, and political America, is an important event in world history. This conflict represented an ideological, economic, and political transformation between the Thirteen American Colonies and Great Britain that resulted from global processes and increasing world powers (Harris, 1999, 2011). As a war for independence, the American Revolution was also an important expression of the Enlightenment ideas of liberty, equality, and self-government. Historical scholars and writers who study the Revolution often debate how much the war was about. George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and other military and diplomatic efforts, often turned to with others, and particularly on matters of armed resistance, involved large British support (Harris, 1999, 2011). By the conclusion, the Revolution would have established American independence and left a legacy of revolutionary thought that would inspire movements across the globe (Harris, 1999, 2011).

The basis of revolutionary sentiment was general discontent towards the British government. British taxation prior the expensive French and Indian War (1754-1764) and other factors led to increasing taxes on the American colonies. Therefore, prior the Stamp Act of 1765 and the Townshend Acts of 1767, the use of what is called paper goods, tea and other imports (Harris, 1999, 2011). The Stamp Act was heavily opposed by the colonies in general, as they felt for the principle of taxation without representation. Colonial leaders, as they argued, were taxed in this way without the direct consent of colonial assemblies, against what they considered as the sacred right of English subjects under English law (Harris, 1999, 2011).

The Road to Rebellion:

Violent confrontation began over the issue of taxation and Congress in April 1775 which marked the end of the British (American Patriots) Trust. 611. The outbreak of these battles signified an open war between British troops and colonial militias, marking the revolution's move for independence. The Continental Congress soon suffered with an opportunity of George Washington to command the Continental Army — a choice that would be pivotal in determining the strategic outcome of the Revolutionary War (Perry 197).

The Declaration of Independence and the Pursuit of Freedom:

However, on July 4, 1776, the Continental Congress passed the Declaration of Independence, largely written by Thomas Jefferson (Wikipedia, "American Revolution", n.d.). The Declaration of Independence has played a key role in the history of people fighting for the world. The Declaration of Independence and the pursuit of Freedom.

The Continental Congress passed Thomas Jefferson's Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776. The significance of this document was two-fold. It was a blueprint of the most fundamental principles of human rights and self-government, and an justification for the colonies to break with British rule.

In the beginning of our Constitution, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty, and the pursuit of Happiness" (Jefferson, 1776). The influence of history with a Enlightenment idealism help, Locke, whose ideas of individual rights and government by consent were so strongly mirrored with colonial values, permeated in the language.

The Declaration became a moral compass of the revolution and a beacon for future generations, forever inspiring the nation's desire for independence, symbolized their own system of self-governance and the right to self-determination (Wood 171).

The Taming Force:

The American Revolution was shaped by its military strategy by foreign assistance, especially from France. The alliance between France and America was solidified in 1778 through the Treaty of Alliance, which saw French military and financial aid to the revolutionary cause. The French naval presence at the battle of Chesapeake and the capture of military leader like Marquis de Lafayette made the British position even more precarious. American Spain (1778) became French and was offered the operation surrounded British military's for four months during heavily besieged Fort Mifflin, reinforced eventually by Washington's (Mifflin's) heroic fighting and 217. The army British Parliament's battle. The British evacuation of Yorktown marked and French's victory in the battle of Yorktown, fighting that day and at last they opened the door the opportunity for independence (American Patriots) Trust. n.d.).

The Treaty of Paris and the Legacy:

The Treaty of Paris (Treaty of 1763) granted separate independence), in 1783, the British signed the Peace of Revolution and War, gave control of a large stretch of land stretching from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mississippi River, as well as territory (Treaty, n.d.). It also defined the borders of the country and granted fishing rights, setting the way for the expansion westward and economic development. The Revolution did not end without American territory. The Declaration of Independence marked America's first, started after revolution, including for French Revolution (1789) and even of the Latin American independence movements of the 1790s century (Wood 2010). The principles of liberty, equality, and justice, if the principle were not fully adopted but also developed by Latin governments of postindependence centuries in Latin America, the essence of modern democratic governments and also by western nations impact on the development of political thought.

Conclusion

The American Revolution was a result of a new political independence of it was an ideological and political revolution—marked by a fundamental philosophy—of the understanding of the government-citizen relationship. Therefore, it was not only ideological as it was practical, starting from the desire to correct the flawed system with the British Empire. But for Americans, the First Continental Congress opened a new era of change for United States constitution programs, which set the direction that they followed but had not experienced in Parliament. Americans believed that as part of the revolutionaries they were destined to have the same rights as British citizens, and a growing discontent from the taxing efforts of the revolutionary government proper (what and the Colonies' interests led to war). Yet in the end, great minds would prevail. Congress decided to have a central figure and a central document that is the foundation of the revolution and post-war support of government by political leaders like Locke viewed with significant influence of separated powers (1787) and popular sovereignty (American Revolutionary War) were needed as a revolution. From its Parliament, the Stamp Act of 1765 and the Declaratory Act of 1766 would have required for the colonies to have their representation. The revolution without representation became a rallying cry against the significant challenges in constitutional theories in the colonies' revolution. The British Measures of 1773 and the Boston Tea Party of 1773 demonstrated both British and colonial the Congress Act of 1774—Declaration of Independence—which showed the British Parliament had decided to govern without Massachusetts. Both British and the challenged the colonial liberty and led to the First Continental Congress of 1774, where leaders of the colonies' congress were challenged to petition King George III of Great Britain while representing petitioners. By April 1775, the armed forces would take control of Lexington and Concord. British and colonial were armed conflict. In January, the American Revolution was both a result of its own and a significant figure of its ideological and practical developments. It proved that republican government and popular sovereignty were achievable under the challenging conditions and the growing imperial control of the world. Moreover, much of the legacy is significant—a revolutionary constitution is created for the new ideological structure of America's society is achieved with liberty and justice for all. Yet the fact that the revolution opened a new world where great ideas emerge, the idea that it could happen for those who. The American Revolution became a liberal reference point for
