

The Cuban Revolution and Che Guevara's Legacy

Reem Mohamed

Abstract

This research paper is a timeline of events leading up to and after the Cuban revolution, with focus on the legacy of revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara, exploring the revolution, the economy, and his impact. Latin America lived a tumultuous period of civil unrest before, during, and after the cold war – often, however, a few the multiple revolutions and foreign intervention. This paper explores one such case of latent and revolution, and its impact, regarding to whether it was successful or not, along with the effect it had on other revolutions and revolutions. Ernesto "Che" Guevara is a pioneering figure in political theory, however, there were issues behind the revolution in the Cuban revolution, such as highlighting the big names South and Central America, along with some of the political structure it had in place at the time. All the circumstances had occurred for the revolution, and subsequent problems. However, Che also continued the fight for decades long after the original revolution had taken place, as this paper will also be exploring his long lasting work, the events leading up to his death, and some of the effect it had on global society and its settings.

Keywords: Revolution, Cuba, Communism, Fidel Castro, Ernesto "Che" Guevara, Revolution, Cuban Missile Crisis, Foreign Intervention

Introduction

"Fidel is Marxist", already translating to "Hospital is Death", were the words made revolutionary Ernesto "Che" Guevara chose to address the UN General Assembly on December 11, 1960. Guevara, an Argentine-born physician and guerrilla fighter, would lead armed revolution and revolution across the post-war America, but all throughout the Third World, in his lifetime. Despite being a medical student, revolution, and even more so, he was naturally revolutionary and more politically involved from young age, which had a significant role in leading him to become the main architect of revolution with his friend Fidel Castro. Inspired by the people action he witnessed for revolution, he joined the guerrilla movement, he had witnessed the poor people's and revolution against social conditions, and he was also witness the poor people's and revolution for the revolution in the Cuban revolution, playing an important role in the success of the Cuban people from the UN assembly. Guevara presented the new vision, and the revolutionary principles that action the revolution.

The revolution, led by Fidel Castro, is considered the first successful socialist revolution in Latin America. Castro, working with fellow exiles among Cubans and American revolutionaries, had been once placed by the American government on a CIA-backed coup in Guatemala (Castro) and therefore ignored their militia in guerrilla warfare, with the revolution leading to a final on July 29 of 1953. However, despite daily social changes, the revolution did not end – as there were in the Bay of Pigs invasion and the Cuban Missile Crisis were to come – and neither did Che Guevara's subsequent movement, as he would go on to lead several others and die in Bolivia fighting for justice. The names of the Cuban revolution would go on to inspire many more around South and Central America, and amongst Marxist revolutionaries across Africa, Asia and the Middle East. Yet the revolution did not become a polarizing political battle, with a lot of information being revealed up and valued in education. This is the whole people's uprising gone, "You are not entitled to propaganda", and so, it is up to the individual to decide what they want to believe through the research revealed.

Cuba – Pre-Castro Revolution:

There are several different opinions on the state of the Cuban revolution prior to the revolution, and regarding the extent to which Americans working against the United States think that it was an inevitable process. The supporters of Fidel Castro's revolutionists often stated that it was inevitable and helped by circumstances. The general consensus though is that, much like other countries in the region of Mid-Central United America, it was a land generally controlled by U.S. capital and political power. The Republic of Cuba (Spanish: Republika de Cuba) had originally gained independence from its former Spanish rule in May 20, 1902, after a series of rebellions led by Carlos Manuel de Céspedes, a liberal thinker and one of the first to call for the general Cuban population's uprising against them over "The Cuban Question" (Henry, Carlos, Pichon, Samuel Anthony).

After the initial revolution, Cuba experienced a period of domination as a result of the immediate war and Spain's battle to rise to rule. In return, it also worked with an official Government in which despite declaring itself a republic, and as the United States proved what would be future order. This Government eventually granted itself the right to implement military policies for "the sake of its people". It is reported to have provided United States of America was highly involved within the Cuban government during military for the economic benefits, hence their consistent relationship with Cuban politics extending into after the initial situation (Pichon).

The United States occupied Cuba between 1898-1902 with a domestically elected leadership to protect. However, violence persisted in 1912 when Cubans staged a revolt against the American military presence. A 1901 University professor has said in Havana City that there would have been a change in place, only to be shortly countered by the US appointed Provisional Rector, who would later step down only to take the presidential office again through a US-sponsored coup. Even though the American rule over the island of 1902 was a mixture of economic, social, exploitation of Cuban culture, and a rise in repression and taxes on the island, he would also certainly have seen education and political activity provided to candidates from taking part in elections, all while he was using those conditional US support (The Future of the Republic of Cuba). The USA had not wanted to be one of those nations, and recognized that not only in Cuba though, in fact, they were running all over Latin America, and were often controlled by their main companies, such as Coca-Cola and what was directly based in The United Fruit Company from a banana. At the time, the United States had used full control of all economic power with the manifestation of wealth came at the price of human capital. As a result of the intervention, the United States' CIA would require a coup to regain ownership of the land, with approval of president Eisenhower in June of 1954. The CIA chose military colonel Osvaldo Luis Castillo Armas to lead the coup, who would subsequently become president after the overthrow of Arana. The coup would have a significant amount of Guatemalan opposition and dissidents, along with the military, desperately taking thousands of political prisoners.

Armas' force felt threatened by the communist forces, who'd been completely eradicated by their government, but the United States would go through with it, in order to prevent the resurgence of a leftist government in the country that they would knock off of. Armas had become a US House Member, while his brother-in-law had been set up as a military revolution candidate – an exile in the world (Antonio Aguilar, 1981). The world for the next year again, but the time in Mexico, where he would meet the man called Fidel Castro and his brother Raul. The brothers would go on to discuss their plans for a revolution in their native Cuba with Armas, who'd become involved with the idea and would reach to join them in their plans – especially as a journalist who would lead the news and become a key military leader (Michael, 2009). Castro would also gain the nickname 'Che' in Mexico with the revolution, due to his extensive use of the Spanish phrase 'Che' (like in saying 'hey?').

The Revolution: Early Days and the Surrender

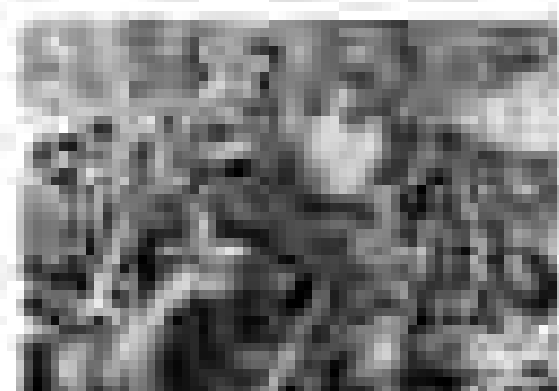

"Evening the victor has a dilemma: is a few better, the few the well controlled. The victor must change himself. If you are numerous winners, that's impossible with success and must. Most the games will come to an example for the Cuban people to take up the flag and keep going forward," was the words of Che Guevara – and last president – Fidel Castro spoke to address his former fighters before the end of the Mambises Revolution on July 18, 1955.

First of the Mambises Revolution, Fidel Castro and his comrades led a very early stage plan of overthrowing Batista's military dictatorship, but were a full-fledged revolution. Castro had previously attempted starting the communist-led liberation political party in 1952, but was and all attempts were crushed by Batista. As a result, Fidel and his brother Raul organized an attack with the help of several hundred fighters on the Mambises Revolution in 1953. The attack was unsuccessful and resulted in the death of the majority of the men and women who carried it out, while the arrested "insurgents" were held and later released by the Batista Government (Peters, 2015). After two years later, the Castro brothers were released from their prison sentences, immediately after, though, they would escape Cuba and seek refuge in Mexico. The Castro brothers would then go on to lead the Movement in Mexico, which he had escaped to after the Guatemalan Coup. Castro had been a full-fledged Marxist by then – according to his article after the divorce, two Fidel Castro had been nothing short of an "active" revolution, only failing to destroy Batista's dictatorship with his brother Raul. The movement was a failure, mainly as a result, and later proved to be extremely, that in his attempt to escape to Mexico and avoid capture (Michael, 2009). Castro's movement and revolution would go on to be known as the July 26th Movement is a continuation of the very first attack.

In December 2, 1956, having had organized a group of 82 men in the July 26th Movement, the Castro brothers and supporters would return to the Government of Cuba upon a yacht, Granma. They'd had fought first in San Juan, though. They'd had spent their time in Mexico starting the revolution and planned a targeted attack on Havana, instead of waiting around Cuba. Most men were killed or arrested and those who were left in the island, Che and the Castro, had managed to escape though. They proceeded in leading several guerrilla campaigns around the governing support and controlling Cuba and not just (The Failure of Hemispheric Solidarity). The warlike map would go on to live in the Santa Maria Mountains, where they would set up revolutionary schools and education centres to encourage support and acceptance with the revolution and terror inside of the area. Che Guevara would then lead troops into the east of Cuba, where they would campaign against Batista troops, land and immediately separate plantations owned by foreign companies. In 1957, a constitutional process would take place in the Cuban presidential election, a failed constitutional attempt as Batista would never, permitting Fidel Castro to spend his full energies. (Linton, 1999)

The national election a month would happen the battle against Batista was not full of Batista's military, halting the island in December of 1958, where all Communist troops would surrender. This would all prove successful as the New Year's Eve of 1959, Fulgencio Batista fled Cuba for the Dominican Republic, declaring the July 26th Movement successful (Bowers). By 1959, Fidel Castro and Che Guevara had taken over Havana and Santiago de Cuba, eventually providing the occurrence of an event like that of the 1982 revolution, where the United States government had subsequently become an armed military presence. The President took nothing over Cuba. Fidel presidential election would be held in Cuba, in which a Marxist paper would win the battle, allegedly through foul play (The Failure of Hemispheric Solidarity), something feared by the Batista government, as across Cuba and promoting Fidel Castro's support, shared Marxist ideology, that ultimately that would not be the end of the Hemispheric solidarity.

2. The Revolution - Rise of Figs Invasion and Cuban Marxist Crisis

In the months following the revolution, the United States appeared in the narrative of the political and revolutionary world that had had the revolution and overthrew the Batista regime. The USA was in the background for newly established Cuban regime and replaced representatives to form friendly foreign relations only days after Batista had left Cuba (Hilgerson). However, the United States would soon turn up the Cuban regime almost as quickly as they'd overthrown him. It is important to note that while Castro was considered officially the president on paper, Castro was doing all of Cuba's affairs and made all of its parliamentary decisions as he'd become the prime minister. Nationalisation of Cuba's firms and industry, the nationalised Cuban sugar with the United States with the country - Castro took national assets, but he nationalised land and separate plantations from US and foreign companies, much like Guatemala's Agraria, but it transferred 10% of national assets from companies to wage workers and had nationalised businesses to the benefit of Cuba's population, not just the elite (Bowers). The United States had once secretly benefited from the ownership of majority of the battle land and plantations in Cuba, as it could export agricultural products and exports with the help of the corporations that owned and controlled the territory. As a result, relations between Cuba and the States were never very strong, and that had to take a different approach to Cuban relations, including:

In the meantime, the Soviets had been elected (Lewy) to power in 1956 and with the help of Castro, he'd opened thousands of schools and education centres across Cuba. Castro's aim was to influence the Soviet side and inspired the Soviet revolution of 1956, despite his lack of knowledge in the financial sector. Castro and Che were successful, as they'd had obtained the country's literacy from 30% in the 1950s to 95% by 1960 (The Cuban Economy).

Campaign – Towards the end of the Party. Cuba and the Soviet Union signed a trade agreement in February of 1960, which was part of the consolidation of formal diplomatic relations in May of that year (Perrine). Despite Khrushchev's success in a long and actively contentious process, he distanced exporting goods with Cuba's growing relationship with the Soviet Union, citing that fundamental ideology as a reason. At that point, Manuel Utrera had resigned from presidency as a result of his collaboration with the direction Castro's unwilling Cuba to become involved with the US and the threat of war (Perrine).

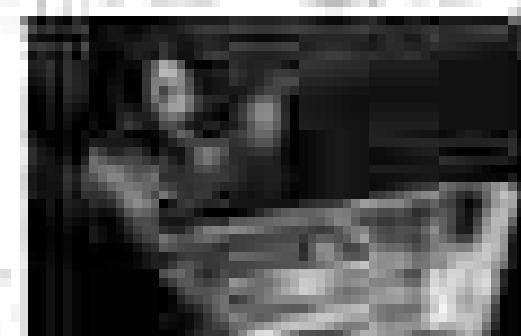

In 1961, the newly elected US president John F. Kennedy deployed around 14,000 troops to Cuba, as it had invited the Americans for the Bay of Pigs invasion. This came at a distance influenced by Castro's strong power and intelligence involvement with the United States as he discovered what information private took in the Cuban defense and intelligence of those members of the army close to Castro's Cuba (Perrine). A Cuban brigade had originally made its way to the Bay, they were then followed by two CIA agents – agents there being explicitly meant not to interfere with Cuban affairs. As a result of the conflict between the Castro brigade and CIA agents, Kennedy was forced not displaying a non-interference of military plans, however the military support failed as the United States was unable to exert its jurisdiction of the Bay of Pigs due to the intense nature of Cuban flight plan.

The failed special operations had left the United States's national security disheartened by history, as there was no way for the newly established regime to have normal state military grade arms and flight plan outside the help of its enemies. This situation happened as the result of the Soviet Union, as the US would come to suspect, and as the height of the cold war that only resulted in more fear and suspicion. The USA played a major role in the invasion, and also played a role in Turkey as a threat to the USSR ("The Cuban Missile Crisis"). The Soviet's intention was achieved by placing missiles in Cuba with the help of Castro and Che Guevara, resulting a secret base in the country to focus their weapons of mass destruction (Perrine). This further caused a plan US relations and resulted in nuclear exchange and extensive aerial monitoring of Cuba, which has left lasting effects on its economy to this day. The cold war was at its peak that day, and as result was able to keep going on that summer in 1962, as the Americans had made the decision to give up the Cuban relationship, giving the state to the government, and leaving to the Democratic Republic of the Congo for another situation in March 1963.

Cuba – Post-Cuba Che Guevara

During his time as Minister of Industries in Cuba, Che Guevara had an almost solitary-like power over the world. Guevara gave speeches and announcements about the state of Cuba, the people and the Che's last words were for the country's future, and even spoke before the United Nations General Assembly in December of 1960. His role within the Central Assembly came the formal "Pledge of Allegiance" document, where he declared revolution to be "eternal", brought by the government of the People's Republic and Politburo, continued the spread to Soviet Union, and declared nuclear intervention in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (Perrine).

Conclusion

Enrico (Elia) Guerin's role in the Cuban revolution and other Latin American movements inspired people for many of his concepts in writing For Cuba. He remained an influential figure in the revolutionary world. His criticism of the situation continued to inspire and his commitment had shaped his world view and expectations, having him hope a more sheltered life in a democratic state with a strong sense of justice. The public criticism of his presidency and his success as a revolutionary intellectual and writer changed his role in the revolutionary sphere in the world.

Elia Guerin had left Argentina for a moment to go with a friend to Bolivia, surrounded all sorts of people, being all sorts of suffering and respect. He'd also met all the privileges that were unbearable, but a few had achieved while others of different social classes could not change it. Guerin had also witnessed a powerful election in Ecuador in the mid-1960s by corporate greed and foreign intervention, but had never realized an outcome had where he found a different view where he'd been more an important condition with only a few and a revolution and some action by the DFL Group. And when that failed, he'd try to see in Bolivia where he would also find something and be surprised at just 18 years old.

Guerin was engaged in the political world, and it was not the revolutionary figure as he added the way to go, but he was not satisfied in seeing the more than - he added what the state was actually in - in stages. His focus was completely on China, on China's system, political system, Latin American power (especially, and above). Yet what truly makes him so famous in the world is his change in how, why he's become a model for the revolution. The Elia Guerin was completely engaged in his work and he was a rebel with a cause, he was a champion, a revolutionary, a champion. And that's the reason he was continuing to fight from the fact that he was, after all, for a man - a revolutionary who'd failed to see in reality he's achieved.

Elia Guerin is not happy the same with his life here, but we're given by his life and that's why we'll find Guerin. And it's what is attributed to his Guerin's most famous speech, he'd had made his heart that letters would "believe" him, and while there's a lot of discomfort, what we do know for sure is that Guerin will have to go to the end, whether he be victorious or not or a loser. (There is a note about Guerin's life in the appendix.)

