

Although the power of the president is enormous, it is not unlimited. The president's power is limited by the Constitution, the laws of Congress, the courts, and the people. The president is also limited by the fact that he or she is elected for a fixed term of office and must stand for reelection. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of Congress and therefore cannot veto legislation. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the judiciary and therefore cannot interpret the Constitution. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States.

The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the legislative branch and therefore cannot introduce legislation. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the judiciary and therefore cannot interpret the Constitution. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the legislative branch and therefore cannot introduce legislation. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the judiciary and therefore cannot interpret the Constitution. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States.

The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the legislative branch and therefore cannot introduce legislation. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the judiciary and therefore cannot interpret the Constitution. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States.

There is a strong case to be made that the president's power is not unlimited. The president's power is limited by the Constitution, the laws of Congress, the courts, and the people. The president is also limited by the fact that he or she is elected for a fixed term of office and must stand for reelection. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of Congress and therefore cannot veto legislation. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the judiciary and therefore cannot interpret the Constitution. The president's power is also limited by the fact that he or she is not a member of the executive branch and therefore cannot execute the laws of the United States.

© 2000 The McGraw-Hill Companies